

Editor's foreword

Experimental archaeology is the mean that allows us not just to reconstruct technical aspects of manufacturing of different items, but also allows us to reconstruct structures of ancient societies since technologies always suppose the existence of certain social structures. Experimental archaeology should not artificially narrow itself by reconstructing technical aspects only, it should always be reconstructing of a society. And the uttermost form of experimental archeology is the reconstruction of a system of rituals and myths, and the reconstruction of language.
